Overview

The park, which is divided into North and South sections, is comprised of a firing range site of the old military together with a repatriate site.

North area The part of the park facing the street has benches under the trees, an ideal place for pedestrians to sit down and take a short rest. In the back is an area where children can race, play ball games, etc.

South area This arrowhead-shaped park is surrounded by Auxiliary Route No. 6 and Loop Route No. 3. There is also a multipurpose plaza where people can enjoy sports right in the middle of this urban location. Additionally, on the opposite side of the road lies Aoyama Ceremony, one of the nation's first public cemeteries. Both sides of the road running north to south along the center of the cemetery are lined with cherry trees, making this a prime cherry-blossom viewing site of the Tokyo area.

This is our legacy!

The place known as "Aoyama"

Are you aware of the origin of the place-name of Aoyama? Prior to the Edo period, most of the area known as Aoyama consisted of the villages of Harajuku and Kami-Shibuya. Aoyama Tadanari, vassal to Tokugawa Ieyasu, is said to have built his residence on this land, thus the name "Aoyama." This Mr. Aoyama originally lived in the Aoyama area of Agatsuma-gun, Kozukenokuni (currently Gunma Prefecture), taking the name Aoyama. Therefore the location name Aoyama is said to originate in Gunma Prefecture. There remains to this day an anecdote regarding Tadanari: once when he accompanied Ieyasu on a falconry trip, the two were looking out to the west from a top Akasaka, and Ieyasu said: "Take a ride around with your horse. I'll give you the land you mark off for your residence." Tadanari rode the horse to death, thus acquiring a large area of land.
